General Lawton Fell While Leading His Men in Battle,

SAD NEWS VERIFIED BY GEN. OTIS

Additional Details of the Deplorable Event at San Mateo.

EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET

Last night the adjutant general received official confirmation of the death of Gen. Lawton through the following message

"General Lawton, engaged in driving insurgents from San Mateo section of country, northeast of Manila, killed instantly at

Secretary Root and the President each expressed his profound grief at the confirmation of the report of the death of the gallant general. The following additional details of the death of Gen. W. H. Lawton were cabled to the Associated Press from Manila last an insurgent stronghold throughout the war. The valley has several times been invaded, but never held by the Americans. Gen. Geronimo was supposed to have there the largest organized force

The night was one of the worst of the season. A terrific rain had begun, and is still continuing. Accompanied by his staff

The news of the tragic death of General Lawton came with a painful shock to the officers of the War Department, to nearly all of whom the deceased general was per-sonally known. The Capture of Geronimo.

The indians came to know him as the nost active, vigilant, wary and determined of foes, and his pursuit and capture of Geronimo, the famous Apache chieftain, has gone down to history as one of the most remarkable campaigns ever undertaken with the small force in hand. General Miles picked out Lawton of all men to lead the chase after the dreaded Indian chief, and for three months, day and night, without a pause, through all sorts of vicksitudes of weather and personal suffering. Lawton hung on the trail like a bloodhound until the game was run to earth, and for the first time in a quarter of a century southeastern Arizona was pacified.

A Soldier Since Seventeen.

Lawton was a soldler when a boy. was only seventeen years of age and studying to fit himself for college when the civil war broke out. That was in Indiana, and nine days after the first shot was fired at Fort Sumter the youngster dropped his studles to enter the 9th Indiana Volunteers. He entered so zealously into his soldierly duties when his regiment was mustered out emonths later he was sergeant of Compt. He lost no time in re-enlisting as ill sergeant, and in August of '61 was a lieutenant in the 30th Indiana Volunter. The Indiana troops saw some of the viest fighting of the war, and Lawton always in the thick of it. it was in this branch that he did all of his Indian fighting, winding up as a captain in the 4th Cavalry in 1879. He had fought Comanches, Klowas, Cheyennes and Apaches for eight long years, and had done as much as any man to solve the Indian problem for the western settlements. In 1888 he quit the line to enter the staff as major and inspector general, and in this place he remained until the outbreak of the Spanish war.

Here again he added laurels to the wreath which already adorned his head, for the world has never seen, in the judgment of the army officers in Washington, the equal of the magnificent campaign made by Lawton clear through the center of Luzon, crushing and driving before him the Tagals at every step and breaking the backbone of the insurrection so effectively that its leader is now a fugitive and its government a thing of the past. in the minds of the people.

MANY EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET. Friends and Admirers of Gen. Lawton Deplore His Death.

From all parts of the country have comexpressions of deep regret at the unfortunate death of Gen. Lawton at San Mateo vesterday. These expressions are voiced dier personally and by those who only nents in the field.

Col. Charles Denby, a member of the Philippine commission, said in reference to the death of Gen. Lawton:

"He stood there, exposed to the fire of the artillery and of the sharpshooters and infantry of the enemy. Wheaton stood beside him. The Filipinos had gone to church the night before, and had registered an oath that no American should ever cross the bridge which the Spanlards had never been able to cross. "The death of General Lawton is a calamity, yet one that I have been in dread of ever since he took command of our division last March. In point of dash, energy and endurance, he was our best. His one fault lay in his utter contempt for danger. We could not prevail upon him to use cover' or shelter of any kind. He was continually running into every kind of danger, exposing himself to death or capture when there was no need of it. He wanted to see everything for himself, and would stalk out in front of the lines, the most prominent figure on the field.

"We loved him—we always havo, ever since old cavairy days, when he was the hardiest and most daring of all the band of young officers that won distinction under Crook, Miles and Merritt, He was Mackenzie's right bower, and his later work in the Philippines was incomparable. Major Gen. Henry W. Lawton possessed in a singular degree the respect, the admiration and affection of the American people. His career touched the popular imagination, his achievements and personality inspired a faith which grew with his advancement and broadened through every new field of his endeavor. He was resistless in energy, eager in effort, fertile in resources, and he died, as he had lived, in the van of his troops. And the country, mourning his death in the hour of fruitful and almost consummated activity, will cherish reverently the memory of his life and its sacrifice.

It was characteristic of Gen. Lawton to lead, not to send, his men into action, and the fate to die with his face to the foe was the fate which he had invited a thousand times. If he was always and everywhere brave to the point of rashness, there is no telling what the country owes to the inspiration which during all the years of his brilliant and arduous service the soldiers under his command have derived from such an example of intrepid courage, from such an example of intrepid courage, Gen. Lawton died without the promotion which he had nobly earned and which was about to be conferred on him, but higher rank would not have enhanced his fame or given him a securer place in the hearts his countrymen.

The death of a brave officer like this enables us all to sympathize more deeply than before with the awful bereavements that have lately failen upon the English people. We can understand, too, how such bereavements only deepen the determination to push the war to its end, "that these dead shall not have died in vain." It is idle, in either case, to question the policy that brought the war about. The soldier does not "ask the reason why." It is his to do his uttermost, and if need be to die, for the flag that he upholds, and whether he fall on the broad field of battle or among ambushed savages, his countrymen and the whole world will honor him and hold him in affectionate remembrance. brance.

The loss of Gen. Lawton will be feit as much in peace as in war. He understood the Filipinos, sympathized with them, and could have helped them to build up their institutions under our flag. The man that killed him did as ill a turn to his people as Wilkes Booth did to the south.

Henry W. Lawton was a brave and briliant soldier, respected by his superiors for his military skill and beloved by his soldiers for his daring. He had energy, rapidity, the cunning and severe experience of border warfare. He seemed reckless of his life, but he was always a sound tactician and a careful planner of dashing enterprises. Against the Indians, in the civil war, in the Spanish war, and in this, his last campaign, he showed the sound head war, in the Spanish war, and in this, his last campaign, he showed the sound head and heart of a true soldier and leader. In Cuba and Luzon his services were of especial distinction. It was always interesting to see how skillfully he applied or modified the old lessons of frontier warfare to the new territory in which he fought. In the last few months he has been breaking up the rebels with remarkable skill and success. He dies after continuous victory and at the head of his troops. Fortunate in his campaigns, fortunate in his end: a sufficient epitaph for any commander.

A NOVEL BRIDGE.

It Carries a Sort of Aerial Ferry Boat From the London Sun.

A novel bridge has just been completed at Rouen. The structure spans the Seine at a point about one-eighth of a mile distant from the Boieldieu, the principal bridge of Rouen. The authorities of Rouen had in nind the necessity of providing an additional bridge, by which speedy and safe communication between the two banks of the Seine might be had without interfering with the traffic on the river, which has enormously increased in recent years,

At first the city authorities looked with avor upon a drawbridge, but the proposi-ion to build a structure of this sort was uccessfully opposed by the chamber of commerce, upon the ground that a drawbridge was expensive, cumbersome in operation and not infrequently out of order, entailing considerable expense for repairs and causing much annoyance and loss of time to the traveling public.

It was finally decided to build a bridge, the like of which existed at that time in the like of which existed at that time in only two places in the world—at Nervion. In Spain, and at Bizerta, in Tunis. The work of construction began with the erection on each bank of the river of a steel pillar 200 feet in height. These pillars were designed to appear light and graceful, while being, in fact, massive and strong in every part.

Between the pillars, at a height to admit of passage beneath of the largest vessels, a sort of suspension bridge was built, consisting of a horizontal platform, supported by strong steel cables, stretched between the summits of the pillars on shore. The platform, or base, of this overhead bridge is 155 feet above the water. Upon it are several steel tracks, along which roil the wheels carrying the vertical cables and the wheels carrying the vertical cables and the car attached to them.

and furnished for first-class passengers; the other a simple shelter for those of the second class.

The combined weight of the vertical cables, rails and rollers and the car, when loaded to its full capacity, is about 105 tons, and this is the weight which the pillars and the overhead structure must support. As an extra precaution, the mechanism and the vertical cables have been duplicated, so that in case one set should become damaged the other may be put into immediate use. A system of counterpoises is presumed to make derailment impossible. Work upon this novel bridge was begun in April, 1898, and the structure was completed within one year. It was not, however, open to traffic until quite recently. The bridge was built by M. Arnodin of Chateauneuf-sur-Loire, who makes a specialty of these so-caled "aerial ferries." Besides the one at Rouen and two others before mentioned, he is now preparing to build a fourth over the River Scheldt at Antwerp.

The total cost of the new structure at Rouen was only f2.500. It was pronounce safer and more to be relied upon for unin terrupted use than a ferry, while at th same time being much less expensive t build and operate than a permanent bridg of any other description.
